

From the Melting Pot

A hearty serving of cultures and heritage at every meal.

Two hundred years ago, America was home to a diverse population: descendants of settlers from all castes. In Louisiana, the aristocrats feasted on luxurious Creole fare – French classics but with the exotic flavours of other cultures: Spanish peppers, Italian tomatoes and African okra. The country folk developed Cajun specialities, which marry several traditions and are significantly spicy and robust. The rich foods they ate then made up America's first melting-pot cuisine.

Elsewhere in the American heartland, the cooking traditions were more practical. From simple church suppers to the cuisine of the Latin American immigrants, much of their fare consisted of grains, potatoes and corn. And being sustenance for the working folk then, food was dished out in big portions. This culinary heritage best explains why American foods are often hearty and flavoursome.
